Shutdown Corner 2: Scared Money Don't Make None was composed, performed, and recorded by John Hoppin in Bushwick, Brooklyn over the brutally hot summer and frozen ice hell winter of 2010-11. The follow-up to 2010's Shutdown Corner, Shutdown Corner 2: Scared Money Don't Make None is a rock and roll tribute to the ghosts of IDM, northwestern lo-fi, krunk music, European psych, and 'out' music from Ayler to Partch.

Hoppin's roots are in San Francisco's eclectic warehouse music scene where he rapped with Gold Chains, played rock and roll on bills with USAisamonster and Afrirampo, mellowed out at acoustic café sessions or raved way past midnight in tenderloin lofts. Moving to Brooklyn in 2006, he condensed his setup and began playing fly-by-night electro-acoustic gigs in packed-for-a-night Brooklyn warehouses, at the rusty edge of the NYC music scene.

Using electronic dance music as the lens, Hoppin has patched together a beautifully warped tapestry of these brown-acid sounds, hung it on the walls, turned on the black lights and thrown a rager. In this mangled dancehall sound bleeds together - warehouse noise into country into rap music hooks, and the phantasmagoric party goes on. Endlessly hybridized, head up and ears open, this is ammunition for culture war. Scared Money Don't Make None!
